A CURIOUS TALE

Told About The Strategy Of a Japanese Cook

"Me—his wife, yes—"

It was cleverly said, with a musical rhythm attached to the yes. Only a little demure Japanese maiden of sixteen Oriental summers could say it in such a laughable fashion.

But to her declaration a serious situation is connected. According to a report made by a close friend of the alleged husband of the tiny miss from the flowery kingdom, it is a huge joke with him. In fact he considers that he has done something very clever—perhaps he has—perhaps Uncle Sam may not think so if an investigation is pursued.

This affable Japanese is a second cook at one of the popular seaside hotels. Many years ago he loved a girl in Yokohama, and vowed that some day, when he had accumulated sufficient American dollars, he would marry her. A steady rival, however, got into the race, and the boyhood lover was forgotten. Strategy—ever uppermost in the Japanese mind for the means to an end, carefully planned it all out—after hearing that his chances had gone glimmering. While at the hotel, he met and admired much another girl of his own race, who was unfortunately for him the wife of the first cook. Not that he forgot his first love, but he was flirting some—just to pass the time away. But jealousy is a strange factor in love affairs, and the little wife had begun to look on the second cook with favor. When she heard of his plans to kidnap the girl of his youthful ardor, she said nothing, but waited.

Through a friend in Japan the second cook managed to secure the girl's consent to join him in Honolulu. But an obstacle lay in the way of consummating this plan—Uncle Samuel's strict immigration laws. So it was decided that she should come as his wife—how the marriage certificate was managed—the details are not known, but at last she came. And she has been here two months. On her arrival, the neglected wife of the first cook, who had been basking in the would-be bridegroom's smiles—got busy, intensely so. Knowing the whole situation, she first threatened the cook with exposure, then dared him to marry the girl.

What a lovely predicament to be sure. For the Japanese maiden was living in daily hopes of the promise made to her being fulfilled, that she was to wed the man for whom she had given up home and all to meet here. Then the second cook did a most remarkable thing. He displayed the marriage license to a very close friend, and told him it was bogus, and that he had only prevailed on the girl to come to Hawaii on a $200 wager that he could sneak her through. Another story, however, is told that an employment agent figured in the affair, and paid the second cook $200 for the delivery of the girl, who is now seeking household employment.

SPLENDID CONTEST AT LAUPAHOEHOE SCHOOL.

The Laupahoehoe School gave a very interesting concert and dramatic entertainment on last Saturday evening, June 8th, when nearly three hundred people were in attendance. This is the first public affair given by the school orchestra under the leadership of J. V. Marcell, the principal of the Laupahoehoe government school.

The Laupahoehoe School can proudly boast itself as the only school on the island of Hawaii where there is an organized orchestra composed of twenty-five members. This orchestra is made up of students and has been in training for some time.

After the entertainment, the orchestra played for the dance. The music was excellent and the audience was much pleased. Mr. Marcell received many congratulations from those who attended for his efforts in making it possible for the village of Laupahoehoe to have such a fine musical organization.
